

Hi, I'm Jen. When I first became a new parent, I didn't have a clue. I don't think I'd ever even changed a baby's diaper.

My first child developed many fevers, and the Tylenol basically lived on our counter. Which meant the mess did, too.

Every couple of days, we'd throw away the soggy paper towel and get a new one. Sometimes the syringe or plunger would roll off the counter onto the floor and we'd have to wash it again. If we had to give her medicine in the middle of the night, we'd end up drying the pieces on whatever was within reach. It was a mess and so frustrating!

Boxes didn't hold up, and baggies slowed us down. Not to mention losing the syringe or plunger during late night bouts.

No one was even talking about this. Was I the only one frustrated by this problem?

I wasn't.

Once I decided that I wanted to find a way to attach the syringe and plunger to the bottle, I went through countless designs. I wanted the syringe and plunger to snap into the clip separately, to facilitate drying. I wanted it to be balanced so the bottle would sit upright, regardless of how much medicine was still in the bottle. I wanted it to be minimalistic and easy for all parents to use.

Moms and dads who saw it in pictures responded with: "Brilliant" or "That is such a great idea!"

So we made it. Sickness is frustrating. Giving medicine shouldn't be.
